

It is a very easy to insert a spanking scene into this story, without adjusting the narrative at all: there's a perfect opportunity in episode 3 after Victoria carelessly tells Harold Chorley about the TARDIS, and Chorley goes off to try and find it, locking the Doctor and Victoria in the common room at the Goodge Street Fortress. The Doctor is obviously quite annoyed with Victoria, but in episode 4 he sensitively covers up for her when he's asked how Chorley knew about the existence of the TARDIS. Why? Because, in my version of the story, Victoria has already received her punishment and mustn't be further humiliated.

In the televised story there's a neat break in the action as he starts to admonish her, and we next see them when they are released after Jamie and Evans return to the Fortress. But this time, what the two men hear as they pass the common room is not the sound of the Doctor and Victoria hammering on the door to attract attention. It is the sound of spanking: the rhythmical, explosive slap of a hand across fleshy, skimpily covered buttocks, and Victoria's high-pitched cries of 'Owww!' and 'Oh, Doctor!' And once they have unbolted the door and opened it, we see the painful event itself: the Doctor with his back to the door, and Victoria laid out over his lap, legs stretched out but unable quite to reach the ground, short skirt no longer covering her snug pink panties, bottom quivering helplessly at the impact of each firm spank. And, on the other side of the Doctor's back, her pouting face reddens too as she sees that her punishment now has witnesses - at least until the Doctor too realizes that the door has opened, and sets the soundly punished girl back on her feet. Nothing more will be said about the chastisement, at least until Victoria needs to be spanked again...